When writing a song that you think should come first, a melody or lyrics? The answer here is it depends, some find it easier to come up with a melody in the first place while others find it easier to start with texts. However, there are those who can create melody and lyrics at the same time. Personally, I find that melodies come more naturally to me than lyrics; although there were times when both music and words came to me with less effort. If you're thinking about writing a song but don't know where to start, try going to a quiet room in your home (bedroom, study, etc.), make sure you have a pen, paper and voice recorder next to you, then close your eyes and see what comes first. If words start pouring out, take a pen and paper and start writing it down. Don't edit your thoughts or reread it, just let your thoughts flow. You'd be surprised by what you wrote. If a melody suddenly appears in your head, get that voice recorder and start buzzing the melody; in such a way that a sudden burst of inspiration will not be lost. Sammy Kahn was an Academy Award winner who wrote lyrics for many memorable songs, including Three Coins in the Fountain, All the Way and Call Me Irresponsible. Although he could play several instruments, Kahn focused on lyrical writing. He collaborated with composers such as Jule Stein, Saul Chaplin and Jimmy Van Heusen to add music to his lyrics and vice versa. He wrote songs for Broadway musicals, films and vocalists such as Frank Sinatra and Doris Day. You know these annoying lyrical sites that instantly try to freeze your computer back into the Stone Age? Well, the next time you just got to remember the texts to Air Supply's All Out Of Love (see above), try LyricWiki, a large and growing database of over 200K lyrical pages. You can search by the name of the artist or song; I wish they had more intuitive search that went out and grabbed partial song lyrics as well. You can also find a lot of background information, news, and interesting music comments here - worth a look. LyricWiki Lyric Dance is a dance style that combines elements of ballet and jazz dance. Lyrical dance tends to be a little more fluid than ballet, and also somewhat faster - though not as fast performed as a jazz dance. Lyrical dance is also somewhat smoother and a little faster than ballet, but not as fast as jazz. George Balanchine remains the most influential and widely observed of all the choreographers of the 20th century. Asked by the interviewer what his dance moves were, he said, Nothing special. This statement probably shocks many, does not mean that the dance lacks emotion; he suggests that his view of dance is that it is determined by the logic of movement, not by emotion or expression. Interestingly, one of the 20th century composers Igor Stravinsky made a similar statement that music expresses nothing. No wonder some of Balanchine's most ballets are set to the music of Stravinsky. No one meant that art should have no emotional effect. They insisted, however, that art did not exist to encourage listeners and viewers to react emotionally - if that was a consequence, well, but art existed as a formal structure. This is best expressed in this structure. Both jazz dance and lyrical dance come from different rooms. Jazz dance, although it often has a formal choreographic basis, is highly emotional and improvisational. The way a jazz dancer reacts to music or storytelling in one performance is likely to be different from her reaction in another, simply because her emotional reaction, which arises at the moment, will never be quite the same twice. The lyrical dance is also focused on the emotional reactions of the dancer, rather than on the basic formal choreographic structure. Although the choreographic structure often exists, it serves more as a general guide than as a recipe for specific dance moves, which, once mastered, will be very similar from one performance to the next. The lyrical dancer uses movement to express strong emotions such as love, joy, romantic desire or anger. Lyrical dancers often perform to the music with lyrics. The lyrics of the chosen song serve as inspiration for the movements and expressions of the dancers. The music used for lyrical dance is usually emotionally charged and expressive. Musical genres used in lyrical dance include pop, rock, blues, hip-hop, ethnic and world music and various forms of urban contemporary music such as minimalism. The music of minimalist composers Philip Glass and Steve Reich is often used by lyrical dance troupes. Since the 1980s, various African musical genres, such as Soweto's music, have also been popular. Powerful, expressive songs are often used in lyrical dance to give dancers the opportunity to express a number of strong emotions through their dances. Movements in the lyrical dance are characterized by fluidity and grace, with the dancer smoothly flowing from one turn to another, holding the final steps as far as possible. The jumps are exceptionally high and soar, and the turns are fluid and continuous.
